Excerpt: . . . the same sort of opportunities that are given to the forward in a forward tip-off. He may take a long shot for basket, he may carry the ball to the basket on a fast dribble, or he may pass it to one of his four teammates. These are the fundamental plays in basket-ball, and while there are numberless variations following the initial reception of the ball by either the forward or guard, four signals will take care of these four starting plays. It used to be a custom for the center to give the signal for each play. He might place his right hand on his right hip when the right forward was to receive the ball or might scratch his head with his right hand when the right guard was to receive the ball, or he might call a number. Some ten or...
