Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: .and waste products, which, under the favoring conditions of warmth and moisture quickly undergo putrefaction. As protection against absorption of these waste and poisonous substances, the colon, with the exception of the cecum, is supplied with very few absorbent vessels, and, in addition, nature has wisely provided this filth receptacle with a valve at each end. The lower valve prevents the untimely escape of the colon contents, while the upper valve prevents the backing up of putrefying and poisonous materials into the small intestine, that portion of the bowel in which absorption takes place with the greatest rapidity. It is now generally conceded that ileal stasis is a controlling factor in the genesis of intestinal toxemia. However views may differ respecting the value of the operations proposed by Lane for correcting ileal stasis, it must be admitted that his work has been of immense practical service...
