It must result in the passage of pathogenic organisms from the carrier to the victim. This may be accomplished through fondling, kissing, biting, or scratching; from passing a pipe from one mouth to another; through chewing gum, or biting the partially eaten apple of another person; through testing the baby s milk by sucking a sample through the nipple of the baby s bottle; through chewing the baby s food before giving it to the baby; through a bite from another man s plug of tobacco; through drinking from another s cup; through breathing air into which some one has just sneezed, coughed, or otherwise sprayed his infected respiratory excretions. Opportunities for such infections are specially present in congested subway travel, movie shows, and...
